Advanced Governance I, II or III; Specialization Option: Law, Politics, Administration Open to Students Prerequisites Introduction to Governance; Highly recommended: Principles of Law Introduction to Governance; Highly recommended: Principles of Law Dr. Stoyan Panov (stoyan.panov@ucf.uni-freiburg.de) Seminar 17.1010.02: Mon, 10-12h, KG1032 Wed, 10-12h, KG1032 Wed, 10-12h, KG1033 This course is an introduction to international law. It gives students an understanding of the way international actors coexist, interact and make law and mastery of the principles governing international legal relations. Public International Law traditionally the law between states, but the course also covers a more diverse group of actors in the international legal order. Some of the fundamental questions discussed in the course are: Who creates International Law? Does International Law work? What are the consequences of breaches of International Law and do States have the responsibility to protect human rights beyond their borders? The weekly plenary sessions and workgroups cover essential topics of International Law such as treaties, custom, and general principles), and the consequences of breaches of International Law (States, Statehood, International Organizations), the creation of international law (Sources of International Law State Responsibility & International Dispute Settlement Mechanisms). The course also clouses on septimating the particular role of individuals in International Law (State Responsibility & International Law (State Responsibility & International Law; 2) identify and analyze International Law in particular problem sets; 3) reflect upon the function and structure of International Law; 4) acquire skills to interpret and apply International Law provisions covered in the course.	Public International Law
Study Area(s) Electives	Course Number	00LE62S-LAS-GO0008		University semester
Module(s) (StuPo 2012) Advanced Governance I, II or III; Specialization Option: Law, Politics, Administration Open to Students Prerequisites Introduction to Governance; Highly recommended: Principles of Law Instructor(s) Dr. Stoyan Panov (stoyan.panov@ucf.uni-freiburg.de) Seminar 17.1010.02: Mon, 10-12h, KG1032 Wed, 10-12h, KG1032 Wed, 10-12h, KG1032 Wed, 10-12h, Gurenational Law: International law and mastery of the principles of severing international legal relations. Public International Law randomlers of actors in the international legal relations. Public International Law: Some of the fundamental questions discussed in the course are: Who creates International Law? Does International Law work? What are the consequences of breaches of International Law work? What are the consequences of breaches of International Law and Os States have the responsibility to protect human rights beyond their borders? The weekly plenary sessions and workgroups cover essential topics of International Law such as the identification and function of actors in the international law (Sources of International Law Such as treaties, custom, and general principles), and the consequences of breaches of International Law (State Responsibility & International Law (State Responsibility & International Law (State Responsibility of immunities, the legal aspects of the threat or use of force, law enforcement mechanisms against terrorism, and the prohibition of torture. Relevant current events will be discussed on regular basis. Upon successful completion of this course, students should be able to: 1) be familiar with central topics of International Law; 2) identify and analyze International Law in particular problem sets; 3) reflect upon the function and structure of International Law; 4) acquire skills to interpret and apply International Law provisions covered in the course.	Study Area(s)		Credit Points	6 ECTS
Introduction to Governance; Highly recommended: Principles of Law Instructor(s) Dr. Stoyan Panov (stoyan,panov@ucf.uni-freiburg.de) Seminar 17.1010.02.: Mon, 10-12h, KG1032 Wed, 10-12h, KG1032 Wed, 10-12h, KG1033 This course is an introduction to international law. It gives students an understanding of the way international actors coexist, interact and make law and mastery of the principles governing international legal relations. Public International Law is traditionally the law between states, but the course also covers a more diverse group of actors in the international legal order. Some of the fundamental questions discussed in the course are: Who creates International Law? Does International Law work? What are the consequences of breaches of International Law? What entities can be considered States? In what circumstances can States resort to use of force? Why do we have International Human Rights Law and do States have the responsibility to protect human rights beyond their borders? The weekly plenary sessions and workgroups cover essential topics of International Law such as the identification and function of actors in the international legal order (States, Statehood, International Organizations), the creation of international Law (Sources of International Law such as treaties, custom, and general principles), and the consequences of breaches of International Law (State Responsibility applicability of immunities, the legal aspects of the threat or use of force, law enforcement mechanisms against terrorism, and the prohibition of torture. Relevant current events will be discussed on regular basis. Upon successful completion of this course, students should be able to: 1) be familiar with central topics of International Law; 2) identify and analyze International Law in particular problem sets; 3) reflect upon the function and structure of International Law; 4) acquire skills to interpret and apply International Law provisions covered in the course. Form of assessment Pass/fail: Regular attendance o		Specialization Option: Law,		Governance I or II;
Instructor(s) Dr. Stoyan Panov (stoyan.panov@ucf.uni-freiburg.de) Seminar 17.1010.02.: Mon, 10-12h, KG1032 Wed, 10-12h, KG1033 This course is an introduction to international law. It gives students an understanding of the way international actors coexist, interact and make law and mastery of the principles governing international legal relations. Public International Law is traditionally the law between states, but the course also covers a more diverse group of actors in the international legal order. Some of the fundamental questions discussed in the course are: Who creates International Law? Does International Law work? What are the consequences of breaches of International Law? What entities can be considered States? In what circumstances can States resort to use of force? Why do we have International Human Rights Law and do States have the responsibility to protect human rights beyond their borders? The weekly plenary sessions and workgroups cover essential topics of International Law such as the identification and function of actors in the international legal order (States, Statehood, International Organizations), the creation of international law (Sources of International Law State Responsibility & International Dispute Settlement Mechanisms). The course also focuses on self-determination, the particular role of individuals in International Law (State Responsibility & International Dispute Settlement Mechanisms). The course also focuses on self-determination, the particular role of individuals in International Law (Human Rights). Upon successful completion of this course, students should be able to: 1) be familiar with central topics of International Law; 2) identify and analyze International Law in particular problem sets; 3) reflect upon the function and structure of International Law; 4) acquire skills to interpret and apply International Law provisions covered in the course. Form of assessment Pass/fail: Regular attendance of classes and active participation in group work and exercises		Year(s) 3, 4, (2 by request only)		20
Seminar Times and Rooms Seminar Times and Rooms Seminar Tr.1010.02.: Mon, 10-12h, KG1032 Wed, 10-12h, KG1032 Wed, 10-12h, KG1023 This course is an introduction to international law. It gives students an understanding of the way international actors coexist, interact and make law and mastery of the principles governing international legal relations. Public International Law is traditionally the law between states, but the course also covers a more diverse group of actors in the international legal order. Some of the fundamental questions discussed in the course are: Who creates International Law? Does International Law work? What are the consequences of breaches of International Law? What entities can be considered States? In what circumstances can States resort to use of force? Why do we have International Human Rights Law and do States have the responsibility to protect human rights beyond their borders? The weekly plenary sessions and workgroups cover essential topics of International Law such as treaties, custom, and general principles), and (Sources of International Law such as treaties, custom, and general principles), and the consequences of breaches of International Law (State Responsibility & International Dispute Settlement Mechanisms). The course also focuses on self-determination, the particular role of individuals in International Law (Human Rights) applicability of immunities, the legal aspects of the threat or use of force, law enforcement mechanisms against terrorism, and the prohibition of torture. Relevant current events will be discussed on regular basis. Upon successful completion of this course, students should be able to: 1) be familiar with central topics of International Law; 2) identify and analyze International Law in particular problem sets; 3) reflect upon the function and structure of International Law; 4) acquire skills to interpret and apply International Law provisions covered in the course. Form of assessment Pass/fail: Regular attendance of classes and active parti	Prerequisites
Format, Dates, Times and Rooms 17.1010.02.: Mon, 10-12h, KG1032 Wed, 10-12h, KG1023 This course is an introduction to international law. It gives students an understanding of the way international actors coexist, interact and make law and mastery of the principles governing international legal relations. Public International Law is traditionally the law between states, but the course also covers a more diverse group of actors in the international legal order. Some of the fundamental questions discussed in the course are: Who creates International Law? Does International Law work? What are the consequences of breaches of International Law? What entities can be considered States? In what circumstances can States resort to use of force? Why do we have International Human Rights Law and do States have the responsibility to protect human rights beyond their borders? The weekly plenary sessions and workgroups cover essential topics of International Law such as the identification and function of actors in the international legal order (States, Statehood, International Organizations), the creation of international Law Gources of International Law such as treaties, custom, and general principles), and the consequences of breaches of International Law (State Responsibility & International Dispute Settlement Mechanisms). The course also focuses on self-determination, the particular role of individuals in International Law (Human Rights), applicability of immunities, the legal aspects of the threat or use of force, law enforcement mechanisms against terrorism, and the prohibition of torture. Relevant current events will be discussed on regular basis. Upon successful completion of this course, students should be able to: 1) be familiar with central topics of International Law; 2) identify and analyze International Law in particular problem sets; 3) reflect upon the function and structure of International Law; 4) acquire skills to interpret and apply International Law provisions covered in the course. Form of ass	Instructor(s)	Dr. Stoyan Panov (stoyan.panov@ucf.uni-freiburg.de)
of the way international actors coexist, interact and make law and mastery of the principles governing international legal relations. Public International Law is traditionally the law between states, but the course also covers a more diverse group of actors in the international legal order. Some of the fundamental questions discussed in the course are: Who creates International Law? Does International Law work? What are the consequences of breaches of International Law? What entities can be considered States? In what circumstances can States resort to use of force? Why do we have International Human Rights Law and do States have the responsibility to protect human rights beyond their borders? The weekly plenary sessions and workgroups cover essential topics of International Law such as the identification and function of actors in the international legal order (States, Statehood, International Organizations), the creation of international law (Sources of International Law such as treaties, custom, and general principles), and the consequences of breaches of International Law (State Responsibility & International Dispute Settlement Mechanisms). The course also focuses on self-determination, the particular role of individuals in International Law (Human Rights) applicability of immunities, the legal aspects of the threat or use of force, law enforcement mechanisms against terrorism, and the prohibition of torture. Relevant current events will be discussed on regular basis. Upon successful completion of this course, students should be able to: 1) be familiar with central topics of International Law; 2) identify and analyze International Law in particular problem sets; 3) reflect upon the function and structure of International Law; 4) acquire skills to interpret and apply International Law provisions covered in the course. Form of assessment Pass/fail: Regular attendance of classes and active participation in group work and exercises	Times and	17.1010.02.: Mon, 10-12h, KG1032
Graded exam. Whiter addigniments, and/or presentations, and/or whiter exam.		principles governing international legal relations. Public International Law is traditionally the law between states, but the course also covers a more diverse group of actors in the international legal order. Some of the fundamental questions discussed in the course are: Who creates International Law? Does International Law work? What are the consequences of breaches of International Law? What entities can be considered States? In what circumstances can States resort to use of force? Why do we have International Human Rights Law and do States have the responsibility to protect human rights beyond their borders? The weekly plenary sessions and workgroups cover essential topics of International Law such as the identification and function of actors in the international legal order (States, Statehood, International Organizations), the creation of international law (Sources of International Law such as treaties, custom, and general principles), and the consequences of breaches of International Law (State Responsibility & International Dispute Settlement Mechanisms). The course also focuses on self-determination, the particular role of individuals in International Law (Human Rights), applicability of immunities, the legal aspects of the threat or use of force, law enforcement mechanisms against terrorism, and the prohibition of torture. Relevant current events will be discussed on regular basis. Upon successful completion of this course, students should be able to: 1) be familiar with central topics of International Law; 2) identify and analyze International Law in particular problem sets; 3) reflect upon the function and structure of International Law; 4) acquire skills to interpret and apply International Law provisions covered in the course. Form of assessment Pass/fail: Regular attendance of classes and active participation in group work and			